Coaching vs Training in Restoration: How Top Owners Develop Teams

Canonical Web Version: https://restorationintel.com/coaching-vs-training-restoration/

Direct Answer: Restoration contractors routinely invest in IICRC certifications, Xactimate workshops, and onboarding SOPs—yet still watch trained technicians freeze during emotional homeowner calls or complex adjuster reviews. Training transfers what a technician needs to know; coaching builds the live judgment to apply it reliably, closing the performance gap through structured observation and weekly feedback.

Field Benchmark & Decision Matrix

Dimension	Training (Classroom / SOP)	Coaching (Live Field Loop)	Shop Failure Without Both
Primary Purpose	Knowledge transfer (the 'what' and 'why')	Skill application under live loss pressure	Tech recites S500 yet botches homeowner intake
Delivery Timing	Onboarding, certification classes & workshops	Continuous weekly job walks & file reviews	Decay of standards within 60 days of hire
Owner / PM Role	Instructor or external IICRC trainer	Direct supervisor observing & asking questions	PM takes over hard jobs instead of teaching
Measurement Proof	Written exam score or signed SOP checklist	Clean photos, daily GPP logs & calm closeouts	Zero correlation between certs & margin
Feedback Style	One-way curriculum explanation	Two-way debrief: 'What did you see & decide?'	Passive order-taking crew needing micromanaging

Practitioner Operational Takeaways

- Never confuse paying for IICRC certifications with operational readiness—training downloads knowledge, while coaching verifies execution on messy job sites.
- Install a lightweight weekly coaching cadence: one field ride-along observation plus one post-job file audit focusing on two specific habits.
- Coach technicians by asking diagnostic questions ('What Category cues did you see before setting dehus?') instead of immediately fixing decisions for them.
- Track coaching impact directly through first-visit Work Authorization capture, photo completeness, and fewer supplement rejections.
